Introduction: Lepidoptera, including moths and butterflies, is the largest phytophagous order and among the top species-rich orders in Insecta. It is one of the most widespread, successful and widely recognizable insect orders inhabiting all terrestrial ecosystems and found across all the continents except Antarctica. Although lacking in fossil records compared to other winged insects, lepidopterans are estimated to evolve nearly 200 million years ago during the late Triassic. Phylogenetically, Lepidoptera is most closely related to the order Trichoptera, and together they form a clade called Amphiesmenoptera. As many as 27 apomorphic characters define Lepidoptera, among which the presence of scales covering the body, and wings is the most apparent based on which the order derived its name. Sometimes, the term 'Rhopalocera' is used to designate the clade for butterflies indicating their club-tipped antennae, while the term 'Heterocera' is used for all the moth species having varied shapes of antennae. Lepidopterans are holometabolous insects undergoing complete metamorphosis with four distinct life stages, viz. egg, larva (caterpillar), pupa (chrysalis), and adult. The eggs are usually laid on plants, and the caterpillar hatches and feeds on the leaves. After several moulting, the caterpillar forms a pupa, and the adult moth or butterfly emerges after a period of time. One of the most important roles of Lepidoptera is pollination. Moths being mostly nocturnal play a significant role in the pollen exchange process of night-blooming plants. They also serve as important food sources for insects, birds and bats. Apart from these, they are economically significant taxa as several species of moths are notorious pests of forests and agriculture; as well a few species produce silk, thus, directly influencing the economy of a country. Besides, they are associated with art and culture, where, particularly butterflies have recently become a popular motif in fashion, jewellery, and home decor, as their colourful and delicate appearance is highly sought after.

Global diversity: The Lepidoptera comprises 166, 320 described species belonging to 143 families in 43 superfamilies distributed globally, except for Antarctica.

Diversity in India: In India, Lepidoptera are known by 13,199 species in 3,672 genera, 101 families and 31 superfamilies. Of which, 1,388 species are butterflies and the remaining 11,811 species are moths.

Endemism: 77 species are reported to be endemic to India till date and all of them are butterflies. High endemism is reported from the Western Ghats and Northeast India.

Habitat: Mostly terrestrial, only a few moth species, particularly Acentropinae, have a part of their life cycle in freshwater ecosystem.

Ecological Significance: Moths play the most significant role in nocturnal pollination of night blooming plants. Both butterflies and moths are integral part of terrestrial food chain by serving as insect herbivores as well as important food sources for predators like insects, birds, bats and rodents. Besides, several species actively take part in nutrient cycling by feeding on dead and decaying matters. Lepidoptera, being mostly phytophagous, respond considerably to any subtle change in vegetation of a habitat by showing changes in their composition, abundance and distribution pattern. So, they have been successfully used as indicator and surrogate taxa in several landscape level management and biodiversity monitoring studies to assess the effect of anthropogenic factors and climate change.

Human Significance: Lepidoptera are excellent indicator of habitat modification and climate change. They are responsible for generating substantial economy of a country by producing silk. Lepidoptera are also directly related to the livelihood of many people associated with the textile industries. Moreover, they are associated with art and culture, where, particularly butterflies have recently become a popular motif in fashion, jewellery, and home decor, as their colourful and delicate appearance is highly sought after.

Threatened species: 74 species of Indian butterflies are included in the IUCN Red list, of which Ludlow's Bhutan Glory (Bhutanitis ludlowi Gabriel, 1942) is endangered. Three species are assessed as vulnerable, four are near threatened and rest of the 66 species are assessed as least concerned. None of the moth species is yet included in the list.

Systematic list: (please add the species list)

Protected Species as per WPA (2022): 391 species/subspecies of Indian butterflies are listed under Wildlife Protection (Amendment) Act 2022, of which 96 species/subspecies are listed as Schedule I and 295 species in Schedule II. Again, not a single moth species is yet included in the WPA Schedule categories.

Species under CITES: Indian Lepidoptera are not listed under any appendices of CITES.

Invasive alien species: Data deficient.

Gap areas: Bulk of the Lepidoptera diversity of India is represented in Northeast, western and central Himalayas, and Western Ghats. So, diversity in majority of the area of India is under represented, primarily, due to less exploration. Many species are known only from type collection and not reported for more than last 100 years.
